So this is another note regarding human behavior or I don't know, I guess it's psychology. I noticed that there was a comment this morning about expect, you know what about some understanding of who. What I needed. And it basically raised from another person, by the way. So this. So it got me thinking that, you know, we can. How we think about other people is. Is a big part of. And how they think about us is a big part of how they treat us. So in this situation, which may not necessarily is. Which is not. The comment was that, you know, I. That I was maybe taking up space, that this is my free day and that, you know, I would be alone and that they wouldn't want to bother me.

Andy McGuire - 01:38

And the reality is that I wasn't thinking about that, any of that at all. But they treated it that way. And so there's a couple things on that. First of all, it's our self conditioning. You know, it's like we believe something's true. We act on it being true, even though it's not necessarily true. And not to diminish anything that other people think. But in this case, I wasn't thinking at all that I wanted space from them or whatever. So whatever people believe is true is the way they act. Right. And then the other thing is that's related to that is that people, they. They come from that perspective of their personal view.

Andy McGuire - 02:37

So for instance, a reflection back in my first marriage where I was accused of certain things that seemed to me out of the blue and they weren't how I felt at all, again, related to this and then come to realize that it was. This is really what the other person was thinking and what they were, how they were interacting. So I realized that a lot people are, when they're talking about you particularly, they're really just talking about themselves and where. Where they're at with this. So that can be helpful when you're in a tense situation to just, you know, to bring some other understanding to what's going on instead of taking it personal. But understand that this is something that the other person is experiencing and you may not be able to soothe it.

Andy McGuire - 03:59

I remember one time I was talking about how I was thinking how I thoughts. I've had that come up, which I've spoken about before. They just seem to be random and crazy and out of the blue, but I'm aware of them because of. I believe because of my practice of paying attention to what I'm experiencing. But this person treated it as if I was. And it was a Crazy thought that I was talking to them about because that was the idea. It's crazy thoughts. You don't necessarily have to pay attention to them. But this person I was speaking to believed that was actually true for me. Like I was, you know, I actually believed this and was taking the action that I was taking. It was a horrible thing that I was bringing up, you know, that I never would do.

Andy McGuire - 04:56

And you know, just because a thought come up, does it mean, you know, the thought police, you know, I, I can't prevent thoughts from coming up. All kinds of things come up in our thinking or, and on our perceptions. But this person attempted to, well, tried to fight me over it and combat, you know, confront me over it physically. And we ended up, I luckily had a friend with me and we got this guy on the ground and just sat on him until the police came. But it was traumatic for me and, but at the same time pointing back to what I'm talking about here, it's like people, you know, are going to always come from their perspective of places and not necessarily where you're coming from on it.

Andy McGuire - 05:52

And they probably may be totally not in sync or not even be in the same ballpark. So you could think about that politically and see that, you know, the folks who are spouting off negativity and doom and gloom and, or whatever, which, you know, I'm not saying I don't, I'm not negative at times and I'm not spouting off doom and gloom but this is mainly is coming from there, from within them and what their conditioning. This is what I was talking about the whole talk about here is how we self condition ourselves and put ourselves in a box, that this is who we are and we're not those things. But yet that's how we see ourselves. And then that's also the way we see others, whether that's true or not.

Andy McGuire - 06:59

So maybe we're talking about just one particular aspect of them or what we can see or what we fear. It's like if I'm wearing glasses of rose colored glasses that say that something is ugly or beautiful or negative or untrustworthy or whatever. Those are the glasses I'm wearing. So I can equate this also with the same thing with like the police, you know there, if you're a police person and you're out to get the bad guys, then what you're doing is you're looking and into the glasses of that, you know, there's a bad Guy. And then this is where bias and profiling comes into play.

Andy McGuire - 07:47

You know, we, we analyze human behavior and expressions and what, you know, various details about people and then we make judgments on them and it's that those things need to be dealt with in terms of what their actual actions that we can see that. And so for instance, the guy that tried to attack me, I wasn't doing anything. I was just talking and I wasn't even rude or I was not doing anything to agitate them. But they were agitated because that was where they, you know, they were where their mental, where they're where they were at mentally and in there. And as a result of that, it's some actions that they took. The fighting was their attack and they, that's what they, you know, ultimately got them in trouble was through their actions.

Andy McGuire - 08:53

So this is where karma is very important because it's based on what I experience, how I, how what I what. So what am I doing with them? Am I, am I my reactions to things? So, and you know, the purest thing would be the, an observer, right? And you know, there's calls for compassion in sympathy, empathy, you know, sometimes even codependency, you know, affirmations. But that's something that, I don't know that's not my normally, my approach of coing people. But it is a way that we deal with people especially we care and love about that we, you know, or maybe another thing with codependencies a lot of times is that we, it's difficult for us. So we're really again back to the same thing I'm talking about here is that we're trying to soothe others.

Andy McGuire - 10:08

Reality is we're trying to soothe ourselves because we're finding it difficult to hold what other people are experiencing, which is very understandable. So, but to be the observer of all of this to not push it away, but to come to it from a place of balance, a place of knowing and wisdom is something that has to be purified all the time. We're all constantly looking at this and coming to some kind of understanding so that in the long run, in the future that we're wise to all of these intricacies about human psychology. Wow, that was a longer note than I imagined.
