So this is kind of a reflection. Well, it is a reflection. So meditation and then spending a few minutes, you know, and meditation has some truths to it. The things that I could feel and you know, the facts of the, of what I experienced, the straight facts not interpreted. Although there's a level of interpretation of everything that happens. But that doesn't necessarily mean that interpretation is in fact truth. So I was contemplating, beginning to contemplate who is, who is this, who am I? And there's this debate that we are this conscious being who's here in this body, who's experiencing these experiences. And that's the prevalent belief or interpretation, I want to say interpretation because is interpretation and belief the same? I'm not sure, it's pretty darn close.

Speaker 1 - 02:36

So there was, I think that with impetus for this recording was more so a snippet I heard in the news where someone was talking about truth being the First Amendment, which is free speech. And I think, well, the argument there obviously is maybe some kind of balance against what is professed to be truth. So my truth and my interpretation of things is different than your interpretation. So then we get to this question about what really is ultimately true or not. And I think that, you know, in my mind facts matter and I do, in facts do matter, you know, the ultimately the raw material, the raw data, those are the facts. Now the interpretation of those facts is not necessarily truth, it's an interpretation of the truth because the truth lies in the facts.

Speaker 1 - 04:36

But now the world, I mean, but it's painted in a different way based on belief, what you believe to be true. And there's a danger in that. And that has been the conflict through the ages with human beings, especially now, because the facts really matter. It's the beliefs that matter. And we, how we believe the world to be is how we act on it. But we don't look, we don't dig deep down to understand what our belief systems are. We have this blindness towards our views and opinions and beliefs because we want them to be true. Because it's more of a desire for things to be true. And those things are based on other motivations. I would say ultimately that would be fear, a lack of. And that may be true, there may be a lack of.

Speaker 1 - 06:13

But without getting into that specifically, I mean we can what this perceived lack. If there's a perceived lack of something and then the human part of that is grabbing that self preservation. So that's where the truth is. But it is ignored because yeah, it's just ignored, it's not spoken. And that's where a lot of this nationalism, me first. Is very destructive. And as human beings, as one planet, we're not multiple planets, which would work out with multiple planets too. And I'm talking about here, you know, even if there was a lack of resources between multiple planets, there's a compromise, a commonality of us taking care of each other. We can't live in this world isolated. The food on the table that we eat. We don't go pick it, we don't grow it, we don't drive it in the trucks.

Speaker 1 - 07:57

We don't, you know, we don't, it's conveniently placed at the supermarket. So none of that, all of that is shared. The roads we drive on, you know, are publicly created so that we can get around all of the, that's the basis for all of commerce. So yeah, business is, business has their own stuff. So obviously there are business principles, but they don't. Those don't equate to human needs per se and it neglects it diminishes the others. It looks to take advantage of others. And I think that's the concerns I personally have that you know, we, seems like a lot of things are based on profits first, ultimately we have to make a profit. But why can't it just be sustainable for itself? So we just can't burn up everything and hope for the best when it, when the fuel runs out.

Speaker 1 - 10:08

We have to be smart with how we use the fuel so that we can keep it perpetual because that's ultimately in our best interests as a species. So coming back to this truth. So the truth is what you pay attention to and what you put value on. And if you put value on me first and you second or third or fourth or fifth or not at all, then that's going to harm humanity ultimately. One or few may get, take, get an advantage. But going back to what I was saying earlier, so it's obvious that the one can't have without the whole cooperating or being co opted. And when it's co opted, then it's going to create conflict. We have so many important things that we need to focus on this planet to make humanity better, you know, and we ignore it.

Speaker 1 - 11:56

We have enough food to feed the planet. We have enough resources for the planet at this point in time. Those are not unlimited and we should find a way to best allocate those resources amongst humanity. So that we all prosper together. Because that's how we're going to move forward in the long term is that we do this together. Least we find ourselves alone on an island with no food and a pile of cash.
