Okay, so it's Sunday morning, getting ready to go to shop and get food. And yeah, I've been really lazy lately. I think this is a result of just kind of what's going on in the world kind of being depressing, very depressing, causing, you know, anxiety, not uncommon probably, to a lot of people in this day and age. And, you know, trying to figure out how I can. How to participate, how I want to engage. I am. I am, you know, getting sort of back in the social media. Not. But not really. It's. It's kind of overwhelming. I'm picking my spots. I at least organized Reddit so that I could use it as a. My window into the world other than YouTube. And then I'm also.

I am venturing back in the Facebook world, but I'm very leery of it just because in a lot of ways it's very hollow. You know, I love, you know, I say I love hearing from people, but what we post is kind of hollow too. And I'm sure that's, you know, coming from where I have. I've. I've been this a long way. I mean, I. I am curious to a certain extent about what, you know, people are doing in their lives, but I don't see the attraction of just, you know, if they stay what they. They see, if they say what they say that, you know, talk about what they're experiencing, and I notice it, they're great. But I can, to be honest with you, for the most part, I could take it or leave it. And when.

When I share where I'm going, I'm doing it out of good nature. But if people pay attention or not, I'm fine with that too. So it's really not about that. You know, as far as I'm concerned, as I've spoken to anybody that really knows me, this word, Buddhist word, Sakya dt, is really, which is personality, view, you can call it ego in the modern vernacular, is my greatest teacher. Other than just the whole idea of learning how to be happy, which is basically not suffering, right? Because happiness and joyfulness is just naturally there when you're not suffering. So that's how I connect with Buddhist teachings that way, those two areas the strongest, and it's the most humanly accessible, I think. Well, definitely the suffering part is, although we don't like to think about things in that way, we don't want to think about suffering.

We want to think about things that are happy and bring us satisfaction. That's why the sense world of attraction what we're attracted to is so compelling. It feeds on our fears, it feeds on our misery. It messes with our emotions. Well, it doesn't. We're the one that are receiving this stuff and it's up to us to filter it and to come to some place with it. How it lands with us is up to us really. From where? From our conditioning into our perspective. And you know, our conditioning is not something that is, you know, set in stone. And you know, that conditioning is constantly.

I mean, the conditioning is happening, the world is happening, but it really is up to us to, by being awake and alert and aware for us to look at that in, pay attention to that and to guard ourselves for it and to choose what we pay attention to the best of our ability. A lot of us, I don't know about you, one of the things reason why I'm even recording this right now is because I'm. I'm feeling some way, God disillusioned. I'm, you know, I'm listening to teachings or for barely listening to teachings now. And it's because I'm just finding that I've heard, I kind of know what they're going to say and what they're pointing to. It's really just about doing it, you know, at a certain point, you know, me deflecting and trying to teach others and, or to spread the word.

It doesn't do a hill of beans if I don't. I'm not applying it in my own life. And I think, and the reality is that it's so easy for me to, for me, probably most people, for us to. To just use as another form of identity and how that's how it comes out is by us, you know, instead of doing the work, which is where the rubber meets the road, then this constant seeking, you know, seeking to not seek, you know, to not be, you know, that's another, you know, Buddhist thing that's very spot on. Wanting to become something or not wanting to not become something. So, yeah, it's a. Interesting. I mean, it's very true. It's very true. That's part of this whole Sakya ditty thing.

And yeah, so just the reason why I brought them, I'm right, I'm describing this right now is because, you know, it's very apparent to me that, you know, taking the action is for me to live it and to be it and to bring it in to my life, you know, to, you know, I have to do the work, do the footwork and not, not admitted. This last couple weeks, I've cut back on the meditation part again. And I'm having some morning difficulties, for sure. And with my head. And that's kind of played into. Yeah, I'm just intolerant right now. I'm just avoiding. So. Yeah. So I guess calling myself out that I want to. It's in my best interest for me to take this to heart and to actually apply it to myself, and that's hard. Definitely hard. So I'll end with that.
